Citizen of the Year

Edna Toth is tops

A tireless advocate for the city's most vulnerable and down-trodden residents has been named as Mississauga's 31st Citizen of the Year.

Old site gets new vision

The redevelopment of the old Lakeview Generating Station is one step closer to becoming a reality.

Monday at City Hall, the City's Planning and Development Committee unanimously approved the report entitled "Inspiration Lakeview: A Vision and Next Steps."

"It's the greatest privilege in my life to be a small part of this," said Ward 1 Councillor Jim Tovey.

The vision incorporates hundreds of ideas from residents gathered over the last seven months during a series of public consultations. Those suggestions were used to create a list of core principles that will guide the development of the 100 hectares of land where the so-called Four Sisters stacks used to spew black smoke into the atmosphere.

"This is one of the key opportunities to establish what Mississauga for viewing stars that first led Earthshine president Randy Attwood to explore the possibility of getting an asteroid named after Canada's sixth-largest city.

The initiative began last fall when Attwood approached Canadian asteroid hunters Tom Glinos and David Levy to name an asteroid the pair discovered in 2004 after Mississauga. Glinos and Levy, friends of Attwood's, agreed, and successfully petitioned the International Astronomical Union, the naming body. Mississauga joins Calgary, Edmonton, Toronto and Montreal as the only Canadian cities with such a distinction.

Attwood and his group are now hoping to fund and build an astronomy facility in Mississauga to house a large planetarium and observatory with a large telescope on the shores of Lake Ontario.

"The old Ontario Power Generating lands in Lakeview are perfect because they look out over the dark lake with unimpeded views. Also, the area hasn't got much light pollution," said Attwood, who doubles as president of the local chapter of the Royal Astronomical Society of Canada.

The site, home of old coal-fired Lakeview Generating Station, stopped making electricity in 2005. Mayor Hazel McCallion has called for a "world-class" showpiece to be included in plans (a waterfront aquarium is her preference).

Attwood and his colleagues had a group of Seneca College architecture students come up with a design concept of the facility.

It can be viewed online at <http://earthshineastronomy.ca/>.

Asteroid Mississauga is now orbiting the universe. But don't go rushing out to scan the night sky: it's 450 million kilometres away from Earth and, at just three kilometres in diameter, isn't visible to the naked eye.

That's where the Earthshine Astronomy and Space Science Organization comes in. Members of the Mississauga organization would love to hook residents up with a high-powered telescope to view Asteroid Mississauga, or 223950 Mississauga as it's officially designated, during one of their regular "star parties" at The Riverwood Conservancy.

In fact, it was partly to build local enthusiasm

Lakeview plan includes natural areas as well art exhibits needs to be a waterfront city," Pino Di Masco, a partner with the planning and design company Urban Strategies, said while presenting to the committee.

The core principles were also used to distinguish four themes — blue, green, culture and urban — for the development of the 245 acres of land into a mixed-use community.

Blue emphasizes the water around the site and suggests the creation of canals and water features that pull Lake Ontario into the site.

"There should be a whole set of different experiences that really speak for the fact that this is a waterfront location and should be a fun location," Di Masco said. "It should be a place where people actually come to experience Lake Ontario."

Green covers the need to create a sustainable community. The vision includes rehabilitated natural areas and integrating sustainable infrastructure.

"Others can look to it, in the future, as a model of sustainability," Di Masco said.

The south end of the site would be used to create an "arts and culture island" featuring temporary and permanent exhibits.

The urban theme aims to integrate the redeveloped land back into the surrounding community.

John Danahy, a member of the Lakeview Ratepayers Association, applauded the content of the vision.

"You've done a remarkable job listening to people's ideas," Danahy said. "I think it is even greener than the plan the community put together."

The City must complete a number of technical and environmental studies before creating a final master plan.

Lorenzo Ruffini, Mississauga's project lead, said the City's first step is to circulate the vision to the landowners, Ontario Power Generation, the provincial government and City staff for formal comments.

"We will see if we can come up with a list of enablers, instead of roadblocks and barriers," Ruffini said.

Ruffini said public input will continue to help guide the process.

"The public has been very important up to this point," Ruffini said. "Without the public's support on this, the project could not go forward."

of her efforts and achievements on behalf of Mississauga's hungry and homeless, at a Civic Centre ceremony on May 19.

Toth was selected from among a list of nominees that included builders of seniors' homes, concentration camp survivors, environmental advocates, little league coaches and long-time church volunteers.

Previous winners include developer Ignat Kaneff, realtor Diane Kalenchuk, businessman Laurie Williamson, Dr. Colin Saldanha

City staff will look to expedite public access to the site's kilometre-long pier to maintain excitement around the redevelopment.

"It is just an incredible experience to walk out on that pier," Ruffini said. "It's the furthest out in the lake you will get without a boat."

Mayor Hazel McCallion said City Council will look to provincial and federal governments for funding.

"It's going to take a lot of money. I can assure you it will not be done only by property tax," McCallion said.

and the late Sam McCallion, former publisher of The Mississauga Booster.

Toth, who celebrated her 80th birthday at the Knight's Table, a Peel food bank, by raising more than $2,000 for "the people I work with and represent," said she wasn't looking for recognition when she began volunteering to help women, children and families who had little hope and fewer opportunities.

"It just seemed to be the sensible thing to do," said Toth, who feels "honoured" to be included among the 31 volunteers who have been named Citizen of the Year since 1980.

"Her efforts to make life better for people who require assistance are very time-consuming, but Edna's no quitter," said Sherway resident Irene Gabon in nominating Toth. "She knows and she believes that a remedy and a cure (for hunger and homelessness) will be found."

Praising Toth's "consistent perseverance and positive attitude," Gabon defined the former journalist as "a great ambassador for the poor and a champion for those who have no voice."
